THE CURRICULA

Majors Fields of Specialization

A student who plans to become a candidate for a degree must by the beginning of his junior year select a field of specialization, commonly called a major. It may be selected in either a department or a division. The selection must be approved by the head of the department or the division concerned, who will then appoint a faculty advisor appropriate to the choice.

A departmental major consists of courses within one department totaling from twenty-four to forty semester credit hours plus courses in one or more related subjects selected in conference with the head of the major department, and totaling from twelve to thirty semester credit hours.

The Divisions

The instructional departments of the College are grouped in three divisions: Humanities, Natural Sciences, and Social Sciences.

A divisional major consists of courses within one division totaling some seventy semester credit hours and including such subjects and courses as are prescribed under the divisional statements. The divisional major is designed for students who wish a broad background in a general area of knowledge rather than specialized training in a single subject. Students who plan to take graduate study in schools of law, education, commerce, medicine, engineering, or theology may find the divisional major suited to their needs. It is also recommended for those whose future plans do not require intensive study in a single limited area of knowledge.

Majors

Majors are offered in the three divisions and in the departments of Art, Biology, Business, Chemistry, Economics, Education, English, Geology, History and Government, Mathematics, Music, Physical Education, Psychology, Physics and Industrial Technology, Religion, Foreign Languages, and Speech and Dramatics.
